According to MATÍŠ* (Icelandic Food and Biotech R&D) the levels of pollutants in the edible part of Icelandic seafood are low in comparison to available EU maximum limits. Icelandic cod liver is a particular rarity today because of the low level of dioxin contamination in Icelandic waters. The use and processing of cod liver has in fact been discontinued in many fishing jurisdictions of the world due to the dioxin contamination. Whereas the Icelandic waters remain relatively pure and well below the international standards.
